HONG KONG, Aug. 6—Ramsay Clark, the former Attorney General, who is on a visit to North Vietnam, told the Hanoi radio today that he had seen a dike, a sluice gate, a hospital for lepers and a children's school that had been bombed by United States planes.

An interview that Mr. Clark gave the Voice of Vietnam, reporting on his investigations of bombings, was relayed here today in a broadcast from the North Vietnamese capital.

Mr. Clark is a member of an international commission investigating the effect of American bombing in North Vietnam.

Mr. Clark said in the interview that at Vudong, in the Thu district of Thaibinh Province, he had seen large bomb craters on the tops of dikes, and that the bombs had killed a woman and her daughter.

"When we arrived," he said, "there were many, many people already there working to repair the dike."

He said he had seen the 30-foot-wide Lan sluice gate, on the Thaibinh coast. There had been damage there, Mr. Clark said, but he did not indicate the extent.

Mr. Clark said the hospital and school, bombed July 31, were in the village of Phuvang and that the village had been attacked twice and 20 bombs dropped on it.

Mr. Clark said three persons had been killed and three others injured at the hospital, which cares for about 1,000 patients, and that it had suffered extensive damage.

He did not say how much damage had been done to the school, whose pupils were on vacation, but he said that a bomb had injured the principal and four teachers. Mr. Clark said he had no way of knowing whether there had been military targets near the Lan sluice gate or near Phuvang.

When military aircraft bomb a country, the former Johnson Administration official said, they "inevitably unnecessarily kill innocent people, kill civilians and destroy schools and hospitals and the bombing should be stopped immediately, should never have been done in the first place and should never be done again."
