Intervention
In Chile
Is Denied

Washington

A State Department spokesman yesterday denied in general terms all allegations that the United States tried to intervene in Chilean affairs to prevent assumption of power by President Salvador Allende. But he did not deny some specific charges along that line.

While saying the Nixon administration "firmly rejected" any ideas of "thwarting Chilean constitutional processes" either before or after that nation's 1970 election, press officer Charles W. Bray declined repeatedly to deny some charges which surfaced in an International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. memoranda released earlier this week by columnist Jack Anderson.

Bray said it was the "firm and continuing policy" of the United States to deal with Chile on the basis President Nixon outlined in his Feb. 9, 1972, report to Congress on foreign policy. Mr. Nixon at that time acknowledged ideological differences but said U.S. relations "will hinge not on their ideology but on their conduct toward the outside world."

There were assertions in some of the documents Anderson made public that U.S. Ambassador Edward Korry had been in contact with opposition Chilean politicians and put strong pressure on former President Eduardo Frei to try to prevent Allende from taking office. Asked about this report, Bray said Korry had not been in contact with Frei and "there were no improper activities."

Bray declined to answer when a newsman asked whether others besides ITT had proposed action to keep Allende, a Marxist, out of power.

Bray declined to answer questions concerning any possible involvement of the Central Intelligence Agency. The CIA was alleged to have been interested in some plan to keep Allende out of power.
