

The Man Who Calls The Shots for Nixon

— Jack Anderson

Miami Beach

THE MAN who calls the political shots for President Nixon isn't his campaign manager, Clark MacGregor, but his chief of staff, H. R. Haldeman.

Operating out of the White House on government salary, Haldeman has tried to remain the invisible man of the campaign. But we have established that most of the important campaign decisions have come through him.

The assumption is, of course, that he's acting for the President.

Haldeman issues political directives, approves campaign contracts, receives political reports and coordinates campaign activities.

It was Haldeman, for example, who proposed that a special advertising agency be established to handle the President's campaign advertising.

This unique outfit, known as the November Group, was created for the sole purpose of reelecting Mr. Nixon. It is staffed with GOP-minded hucksters carefully recruited from ad agencies all over the country.

HARRY ROBBINS HALDEMAN, who prefers to be called "Bob," has been an advertising man since he was 23. He has used his quick mind to sell bug killer, floor wax, Disneyland, Seven-Up — and, more recently, Richard Nixon.

In election years, Haldeman was able to take time off as vice president and Los Angeles manager of the giant J. Walter Thompson Advertising Agency to plump for Mr. Nixon.

Haldeman toured the country in 1956 as an advance man for the then Vice President, became chief advance man in 1960 when Mr. Nixon first sought the presidency, returned to the campaign trail in 1962 to help Mr. Nixon lose the governorship of California and, finally, coordinated his successful campaign for the White House in 1968.

Mr. Nixon probably relied more heavily on Haldeman than on any other campaign technician during the 1968 race. After the election, Haldeman largely recruited the inner staff that would be around the President.

Briefing the press, Haldeman said there would not be a press secretary, no appointments secretary and no chief of staff. The man who helped merchandise Seven-Up as the "Un-Cola" had invented the un-assistants.

Then he filled the jobs with his people. Dwight Chapin, one of his J. Walter Thompson underlings, became appointments secretary; Ron Ziegler, another hand from the Los Angeles shop, was named press secretary; and John Erlichman, an old UCLA chum, moved in as another presidential assistant. Haldeman himself became the un-chief of staff.

Having the President's complete trust, Haldeman largely decides who the President will see, who on the staff will be heard, what memorandum will make its way into the President's in-basket and who will be promoted.

LIFELONG Democrat Thomas Watson's emergence as a Nixon supporter this year may be more business than politics.

Watson is chairman of IBM, which presently has a major anti-trust case before the courts. The case was filed as the Democrats were leaving town in 1968 but has failed to come to trial under the Nixon Administration.

Watson's conversion to the Nixon cause has prompted speculation that settlement terms have been reached but that the announcement is being put off until after the election.
