The White House NOV 1 2 1972 And the State Dept. By Murrey Marder Washington Post Staff Writer

The following column appeared in Saturday editions of The Washington Post with several paragraphs transposed or omitted. The complete, corrected story follow:

"Some friction" is bound to exist between the White House national security ad-viser and the State Department, President Nixon finally has said with refreshing candor.

A degree of friction and "competition," the President went on to say in his recent interview, "is not unhealthy," because out of constructive competition more effective foreign policy can emerge. Indeed it can.

The reality, however, is that there has been friction without competition be-tween the White House and State Department for nearly three years. The State De-partment virtually has been out of the game since Elliot No. 2 man to become Secre-tary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in June 1970.

At the start of the Nixon L. Richardson left as State's administration there was an outside chance that the foreign policy-making offices might function constructively with dynamic Henry A. Kissinger at the White House and genial Bill Rogers at State if State had a ers at State, if State had a strong man to run the de-partment with Rogers serving, as the role has been described, as the President's trusted chief lawyer in foreign affairs.

Worked Well Together

Kissinger and Richardson, who comes out of the Boston brahmin strain of intellectualism, respected each other, worked together well. State was hopeful of developing an institutional input in shaping policy with perin shaping policy, with no question, of course, about who was on top. The National Security Council web of authority across the government was controlled, as President Nixon intended, in the White House, with Kissinger holding strings.

Rogers was not a nonentity. Indeed, his non-ideological outlook on the world probably was far more supportive of President Nixon's turnaround on U.S. policy toward China, and the general abandonment of "confrontation". frontation" in place of "ne-gotiation," than ever has been credited to Rogers.

The vital No. 2 post at State vacated by Richardson was filled by Rogers' nominee, John N. Irwin II. Rogers wanted a quiet-working deputy; Irwin has been almost unnoticeable in the most unnoticeable in the post of Under Secretary.

Rogers often has scoffed at the talk of "low morale" in the State Department, saying that has been claimed almost since the declaimed almost since the department came into existence. That is correct as a generality, but rarely to the point of the present dismay. Franklin D. Roosevelt often expressed despair with the State Department; John F. Kennedy called it "a bowl of jelly," and so on.

The Nixon administration entered office with a double entered office with a double legacy of suspicion. President Nixon was Vice President in the Eisenhower administration, in which Rogers was Attorney General. In 1969 State was still trying to recover from the gaping wounds inflicted upon it during the Eisenhower administration from the bureaucratic terrorism of the McCarthy era.

Still Crucial

Rogers attempted to allay Rogers attempted to allay the mutual disquiet. He commissioned a soul-searching study with the department on the bureaucratic couch for self-analysis. It concluded, among other things, that "the role of top leadership in stimulating creativity is crucial." That is creativity is crucial." That is still true.

The State Department today has tumbled into despair. As one official said in the depths of frustration, "We are something like American Express-without its prestige." American

Part of the slide was probably inevitable under President Nixon's style of operation, in which "so many initiatives"... had to be undertaken at the presidential level."

The President's and Rogers' determination to prevent, above all, any State news "leaks," has succeeded admirably; the department rarely knows anything rarely knows anything worth leaking. Top officials, for example, were humiliatingly unaware for years of the secret Kissinger-Le Duc Tho talks which began in 1969; even today most do not know what is in the draft Vietnamese peace plan, except for what is in the press.

Kissinger had told many associates he is very seriously concerned about the need to repair this damage in President Nixon's second term, and to help "institutionalize" the future conduct of foreign policy. It is ludicrous, Kissinger has said, to portray him as is ludicrous, Kissinger has said, to portray him, as some critics do, as "despising" the Foreign Service, for the majority of Kissinger's staff is drawn from it. So everyone, presumably, accepts the problem. All that is still needed is a solution. is a solution.
