Kissinger: He Creates Policies and Headlines

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 22—Pri-little known outside the acavately Henry A. Kissinger often belittled the State Department.

To him it was "the bureaupeace agreement. Employing big industry courtliness wif belittled the State Department. To him it was "the bureaucracy."

Since he began serving President Nixon as his adviser on National Security in 1969, Mr. Kissinger has operated with the firm conviction that foreign policy in the neclear age must be centralized in the Oval Office of the President. This he toiled with a small staff in the West Wing of the White House, orchestrating Richard Nixon's foreign policy.

But Henry Alfred Kissinger is by no means one of the faceless advisers the Nixon Administration has been noted for. He is one of the most sought after men in Washington, by ambassadors, by newsmen, by Congressmen, by many powerful men who want a direct channel to the President's ear—and especially by women.

A Cover-Story Subject

The 50-year-old bachelor with the German accent—he was born in Fürth on May 27, 1923—has been on cover after cover of magazines.

Whether in Washington

A Cover-Story Subject

Washington

A Cover-Story Subject

The 50-year-old bachelor with the German accent—he was born in Fürth on May 27, 1923—has been on cover after cover of magazines.

Whether in Washington

A Cover-Story Subject

The formal accent—he was born in Fürth on May 27, 1923—has been on cover after cover of magazines.

A Cover-Story Subject

The formal acreating acreated the opening of a new corridor with China and the rapproachement with the Soviet Union, including the crucial nuclear-arms agreement. Consequently, he has become the most influential of the president's advisers, the most acrobatic of emissaries, the wost polished and persuasive of his public spokesmen and a man only slightly tarnished by the Watergate scandal. In the Administration's hunt for national security leaks, Mr. Kissinger reportedly approved wiretaps on some of the mem-versident's advisers, the most influential of the rapproachement with the Soviet Union, including the crucial nuclear-arms agreement. Consequently, he has become the most influential of the wastisment with the saviets and visers and even concident the rapproachement with the

Happy Years at Harvard

If he gives credit to what he is and where he is to anyone or anything, it is the happy years at Harvard, to the men or anything it is the happy years at Harvard, to the men who influenced him, to the philosophers he studied and to the 19-century balance of the 19-century balance of the choice to sometimes with news of Vietnam peace negotiations, sometimes with rumors of a new romance.

Now he is the President's choice to command the 12,000 people in the Department of State.

Mr. Kissinger, who will coordinate all foreign policy for the President, brings to his new role a brilliant record in foreign affairs.

who influenced him, to the philosophers he studied and to the 19-century balance-of-power diplomats, principally Castle-reagh, Metternich and Bismarck, about whom he wrote. Whatever the mold, the wholly unprepossessing Mr. Kissinger became a perfectionist, and an accomplished diplomat.

On one occasion a hard-working junior officer submitted for inspection a chapter he had affairs.

The former Harvard professor, whose reputation as a theoretician of diplomacy was World messages.