NIXON, ON A VISIT TO KILDARE, VOWS TO PURSUE PEACE

He Says U.S. Power Involves Defense of Weak Lands-President Returns Home

By MAX FRANKEL

Special to The New York Times

DUBLIN, Oct. 5—President Nixon toured the green flats and hills of County Kildare today, gave his endorsement to a disputed finding that his ancestors lie buried there, and invoked their Quaker spirit to pledge himself to the works of Ending an eight-day tour of Italy, Yugoslavia, Spain and Ireland—plus a brief stopover in Britain-the President asserted that the only purpose of the military power he had come to celebrate in the Mediterranean region was to bring peace to all the world. American power, he said, implies a responsibility to help defend the independence and freedom of weaker nations.

[The President's landed at Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland about 8:30 P.M. Eastern daylight time.]

After the tour the Presidential party went to Dublin by helicopter to save time and security precautions. President Nixon called on President Eamon de Valera and then took lunch at Dublin Castle with Prime Minister John Lynch.

Eggs Smashed on Car

The concern for security in the capital was not misplaced. The crowds were good sized and friendly, but on the way to the palace three persons dashed out at separate points several hundred yards apart to smash eggs against Mr. Nixon's

The first, a young woman, hit the windshield. Mr. Nixon saw her at the last moment, held his hand against the missile and ducked. A moment

Hears of Family Link to Ireland

United Press International

Mr. Nixon with Thomas Cummins, Timahoe's oldest citizen later he rose again and was waving calmly when the sec-ond egg struck. Then, as the car was rounding a corner with the President again on his feet, a middle-aged man smashed his eggs against the window on Mr. Nixon's side.

All were apprehended swiftly. Their purpose was not immediately clear. An effigy of the President was burned outside the United States embassy here yesterday by a large group protesting against the war in

Long-Neglected Plot

Mr. Nixon offered his remarks on American power while standing with his wife and his distant cousin, the novelist Jessamyn West, who has written of Quakers in Persuasion" "The Friendly and other works, at a longneglected and unmarked plot in the town of Timahoe.

"So the people of the United

Continued on Page 11, Column 1

States will meet their responsibility," he said, "the responsibility they did not ask for but that we have—to defend not only ourselves but also, when asked to do so and when it seems to be in their interests and our interests to come to and our interests, to come to the defense of others.

"But let us understand one thing The Armies and Navies and the air forces of the United States of America exist for the purpose of preventing war and building peace. They are peace forces, and that is the purposes of our policy."

On the question of Mr. Nixon's ancestors, an energetic search inspired by the President's visit had turned up a 98-year-old resident who said he had been told in his youth that Mr. Nixon's sixth great-grandfather had lived and died among the Timahoe Quakers three centuries ago. A granite marker recording the President's visit lay beneath two ash trees today and settled any remaining arguments by stating that his maternal ancestors rest there. Several hundred people—including Thomas Cummins, the On the question of Mr. Nix-ard Milhous Nixon of Washing-ton to the Milhouses of Tima-At Coill Dubh ar hoe-cheered the President and dozen other towns, the school-nonagenarian who linked Rich-homes. Cows and burros nod-

1445

At Coill Dubh and half a hoe—cheered the President and chatted with him. Mrs. Dennis Goodbody of Dublin, the Quakers' historian, presented some ran and ran and ran alongside records bearing on the family. The Artane Boys Band from a Dublin correctional school thumped American tunes and then the crowd of officials and newsmen, equal in size to the one it had attracted, drove off toward Naas.

Kildare showed off her hundred agreens from fern to lime hedgerows he could glimpse a dred greens from fern to lime hedgerows he could glimpse a and her swiftly revolving clime hundred idyllic vistas and at from dry to drizzle to wet. Curragh Race Track, scene of Farmers' wives stood with the Irish Sweepstakes, huge babes before the squat stucco clouds of battleship gray sat upon an expanse of brilliant Woods, his executive secretary, yellow green.

In Naas (pronounced "Nace")
Mr. Nixon stood in the rain to acknowledge the greeting of the drenched crowds. The folk of Kildare did not muster the largest crowds encountered by the crowd-conscious Presidential party, but they were the most open and spontaneously cheerful of the trip.

Acknowledging tributes at the luncheon with the Prime Minister, Mr. Nixon noted in jest that American politicians were willing to go to any length to establish even some tenuous roots in Ireland. But his wife's roots here are firm, he observed, are those of Rosemary his counselors.

America's debt to Ireland—to the Irish spirit, warmth, humor and faith—is unquestionable, he concluded.

The President took note of criticism that is widely aimed at American foreign policies. But all Americans, like their Presidents, want only peace, he emphasized—a lasting peace that represents more than the ending of a war.

On the drive to the 'Dublin airport Mr. Nixon encountered to establish even some tenuous more egg throwers. Four or five hurled at once splattered his car and one missed him while as are those of Rosemary he was waving to the crowd. In Naas (pronounced "Nace") his counselors.

and Daniel P. Moynihan, one of