

The 'Other Woman'

JUN 28 1971

SFChronicle

In Ed Cox's Life

Washington

MARY ANN (Mazie) Cox, sister-in-law of newlywed Tricia Nixon Cox, is strikingly hip and a member of the Now Generation.

The tall (5-foot-10) slender New York socialite captured Washington's attention with her sophisticated manner and her mod clothes. She wore grandma style dresses with flat Italian shoes at all the parties where her brother, Edward, and Tricia were feted before the White House wedding.

Mazie, 25, whose light brown mane falls loosely on her shoulders, is not used to the constant spotlight that focuses on the First Family. But she took it in stride and appeared to enjoy the attention.

Mazie has a disarming smile, piercing blue eyes, and is friendly with the press.

When asked if it would be a good marriage, Mazie said: "I love my brother."

While walking down the aisle in the Rose Garden as maid of honor, Mazie was so much at ease, she tried to catch her brother's eye to distract him from the stiff groom-like pose he had assumed.

Looking and acting like a model, fashion is naturally her love. She was one of ten girls to graduate this year from the Yale School of Architecture. And she will be looking for a job—but not soon.

First she wants to travel across the country and is joining up with several friends who will make the journey in a big rented truck.

She says she has traveled every summer and prefers to rough it rather than go first class. She has been to Mexico and India, among other places.

Mazie attended the Chapin School in New York while Tricia was a student there. "I was a terrible student," she said.

But with her family pushing, she decided to go on to college and chose Smith, where she majored in history and later in architecture.

Mazie apparently is not in a mood to settle down. She had her best beau, Brink Thorne, with her at the wedding. But she moaned when she caught Tricia's wedding bouquet — by bridal design of course.

"I'm in trouble," sighed Mazie.

United Press