I Will Go To China. After 22 years of verbal and physical combat, the world's most powerful nation and the world's most populous nation have decided to recognize each other's existence.

For years, as Congressman and Senator, Richard Nixon rode the crest of the "who-lost-China" attack. Last Thursday night, as President, he took just 3½ TV minutes to announce his historic overture.

With files from Washington and from more than a dozen bureaus, Newsweek analyzes the momentous meaning of the visit arranged by Henry Kissinger.

Newsweek discusses the effects of the President's 'I will go to China' on the Soviet Union; on Japan; on the Paris peace talks; on the Chiang government.

And will the Democratic party recover from the finest political upstaging this nation has seen since Ike's famous "I will go to Korea"?

From all over the world, here's what the China watchers think—in Newsweek's cover story, starting on page 16.
