PARIS, Sept. 21 — The 160th formal session of the Vietnam peace conference was held here today, with no visible sign that intensive American diplomatic activity last week had changed the position of any delegation.

Last week, Henry A. Kissinger, President Nixon's national security adviser, stopped off here on his way home from talks in Moscow and conferred with Le Duc Tho, a member of the North Vietnamese politburo. But today's exchanges only repeated established stands, if anything somewhat more strongly.

Seen Barring Compromise

South Vietnam's negotiator, Pham Dang Lam, echoed the statement made in Hue last night by President Nguyen Van Thieu, which was taken in Paris as a direct attack on France and possibly a warning to the United States.

Mr. Lam said his government would not bow to anything but the freely expressed will of the South Vietnamese, and that American help "in no way diminishes South Vietnam's liberty and independence."

In the context of Mr. Thieu's sharp words denouncing what he called collusion among Communists and colonialists, read here to mean the French, the reference to American help was taken as resistance to any possible compromise settlement of the war.

Premier Pierre Messmer and Foreign Minister Maurice Schumann recently expressed support for a three-part coalition Government proposed by the National Liberation Front, or Vietcon, to replace the Thieu regime.

President Pompidou appeared to be answering Mr. Thieu in his news conference today, when backed away from the three-part plan. He said that France continued to support the principles of an Indochinese settlement advanced by de Gaulle in Pnompenh in 1966, but that it was not interfering and did not want to hurt any chances of solution.

He said in an apparent reference to non-Communist opponents of President Thieu: "There are people in Saigon and Paris who are not for one side or the other, and everyone, everyone, looks at them from time to time wondering if they can be helpful. Can they bind the sauce?"

SAIGON, South Vietnam, Sept. 21 — President Nguyen Van Thieu has rejected the latest Communist proposal for a three-part coalition Government in South Vietnam, saying: "Any political settlement in South Vietnam should be determined by the South Vietnamese people themselves without foreign interference."

Mr. Thieu was believed to have had in mind the French Government's support of the proposal, which he considers to be essentially a restatement of earlier ones.

"We seriously warn the colonialists against interfering with the internal affairs of South Vietnam and against lending a hand to the Communists either by word or by deed," he said in a speech last night in Hue that has been rebroadcast several times over the national radio.

Asks End to 'Aggression'

He said, "The people and army of South Vietnam see clearly the crafty plot of the Communists, the colonialists and their lackeys, a plot that is being applauded by some opportunistic elements who are living in exile and calling themselves a third force."

The Communist proposal, made on Sept. 11, called for a provisional government to be made up of members of the

Thieu administration, the Communist side, and "other political forces in South Vietnam, including those who, for political reasons, have to live abroad."

Mr. Thieu said, "We strongly reaffirm that any peace solution should start with an end to Communist armed aggression and the withdrawal of all troops and cadres to the north."

He called on the South Vietnamese army to "maintain the initiative and exploit the present victories to wipe out the enemy" and said "underground Communist cadres" must be "annihilated."

The current enemy offensive, he said, is doomed to failure. "If the Communists do not pull their troops back to North Vietnam, they will be killed to the last man," he said.
