Freed POW
Finally Gets To Go Home

Jacksonville, Fla.

Freed Navy pilot Lieutenant Mark L. Gartley said yesterday he is considering possible civilian careers although he is not "anti-military" despite four years in a North Vietnamese prisoner of war camp.

Gartley, 28, of Dunedin, Fla., met briefly with newsmen as he left the Jacksonville Naval Hospital on a 90-day leave following medical tests and debriefing.

Gartley thus became the last of the three American prisoners of war recently released by the North Vietnamese to leave military hospitals in the United States.

Asked whether he planned to remain in the Navy, Gartley replied, "That's really indefinite. I am certainly not anti-military, but there are many careers I am going to take a look at."

A Navy spokesman said Gartley, one of three POWs returned to this country last month, has sufficient time in to enable him to submit a letter of resignation anytime he chooses.

Gartley, a bachelor, talked easily with reporters about his plans while on leave. He said he would arrive tomorrow in Greenville, Maine, where his father runs a sporting camp, but he refused to say where he would spend the next couple of days, except to say it would be in a city "further up the coast."

Released POW
Home on Leave

Valdosta, Ga.

Major Edward K. Elias, released recently from a prisoner of war camp in North Vietnam, came home Tuesday for a 30-day leave after more than a week of medical tests and debriefings.

"It's great to be back," Elias, 34, said from the green-trimmed brick home his wife Georgia bought while he was a prisoner. "She really did fine." Elias said he was tired and "I just want to relax now."
