

CUBAN EXILES BOMB RADICAL COFFEEHOUSE

by Sue Marshall

A group of individuals, tentatively identified as "Gusanos" (anti-Castro Cuban exiles), attacked the Haymarket, a movement coffeehouse, on Monday evening, April 13, burning the building out with gasoline and using some sort of Mace or nausea gas on twenty people present.

Gusanos (Spanish for "worm") are a group which have been considered responsible for several other attacks of terrorism, both locally and on the East Coast, such as the bombing of the Ash Grove, the invasion of the First Unitarian Church in Los Angeles several months ago, the bombing of the Miami theater where the movie "Che" was being shown, and various fights at peace marches and attacks on individuals belonging to left-wing, radical groups.

"On March 13 the L.A. Times had an article on a Cuban exile who was convicted of the bombings here not too long ago of an airline office," Mickey Haskins said at a press conference Thursday. "The FBI testified in his trial that these Gusanos received their supplies from the Central Intelligence Agency ... "
