Saigon

A government spokesman said yesterday that John D. Marks, who co-authored the controversial best-seller, "The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence," was expelled from South Vietnam yesterday after his name was discovered on a blacklist maintained by the ministry of interior.

The spokesman said that no reason for the blacklisting had been furnished by the ministry.

Marks said that he was here to research a magazine article. He had contacted the American embassy, some opposition figures and a few foreign journalists.

The government spokesman said that when the interior ministry found his name on the list of arriving passengers, an order was issued for his expulsion. Thursday

Train Crash
--15 Killed

Lisbon

Two passenger trains collided near Lisbon's main station yesterday, overturning a second-class car filled with travelers. Fifteen persons were killed and 82 injured, officials said.

Eyewitnesses said the trains were traveling in opposite directions on adjacent tracks and neither was going faster than 40 miles an hour when the accident took place.

night policemen took him and his traveling companion, Barbara Guss, into custody. Then they took them to dinner at La Cave, one of Saigon's finer French restaurants, the spokesman said.

They were placed on a flight to Bangkok yesterday morning.
