Mounties Attacked Over Surveillance

MAY 1 7 1971 By JAY WALZ Special to The New York Times

first time in nearly a hundred beaded, he infiltrates communes years Canadians have begun to and rock-music festivals. In hot the motives of the venerable may use the historic writ of had seemed until recently to be know the power still existed. alien to Canada's relatively free unwanted foreign attitudes to dlers. assail the ears of the once-unassailable Mountie.

his man. In his brilliant uniform, United States military deserters standing out in the forest or but also Members of Parliain the city crowd, he was al-ment. ways courteous and approach-tinguishable from the man in Mounties "surveilled" a meetsitting tall on his horse, he is often a plainclothesman dis-Continued on Page 6, Column 3

OTTAWA, May 16-For the guised as a hippie. Bearded and speak harshly of the tactics and pursuit of drug traffickers, he Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Such terms as "surveillance" tion without warrant, day or and "bugging," "undercover night, to the astonishment of agent" and "secret dossiers" many Canadians who did not

Students and teachers comand relaxed way of life. Now plain that Mounties invade the the epithets, so common across campus "fishing for political the border in the United States, dissidents" while ostensibly have filtered in along with other tracking down narcotics ped-

The renowned 8,500-man civil police force came under fire A scarlet-coated symbol of most recently when several relentless but open police pur- members charged in the House suit, the Mountie traditionally of Commons that surveillance tracked down murderers in the had overtaken not only Marx-Canadian wilds, always getting ists, Maoists, drug addicts and

David MacDonald, Conservative member from Prince Ed-Today's Mountie is less dis- ward Island, complained that the street. No longer a trooper ing held in the province to protest the new provincial Public Order Act. The hastily enacted legislation, drafted by Premier Alexander Campbell, was aimed at heading off rock festivals and other hippie get-togethers deemed injurious to the island's regular—and lucrative—tourist trade.

A Mountie

Continued From Page 1, Col. 7

trade.
Mr. MacDonald asserted in Mr. MacDonald asserted in the Commons that the Mounties' surveillance tended to intimidate Members of Parliament. (Mr. Campbell, a Liberal, was quoted in the press and in the Commons as having said that all Cabinet officials, federal and provincial, had been "bugged," but he later denied having made all Cabinet officials, federal and provincial, had been "bugged," but he later denied having made the allegation.)

The Solicitor General, Jean-Pierre Goyer, the Cabinet Minister who supervises the Mounties and speaks for them, rejected Mr. MacDonald's general accusation as irresponsible. Repeatedly pressed for assurances to the contrary, Mr. Goyer would not deny that they had files on Members of Parliament. While he repeated several times that members were never investigated as such as far as he knew, he refused either to look into the matter or to order an investigation.

"All citizens are equal in front of justice," Mr. Goyer said, adding that federal deputies had "no privileged status in society" and that electronic bugging was legal.

bugging was legal.

But He Would Not Specify

Similarly, Police Chief Har-old Adamson of Toronto said recently that "there are methods of surveillance that you use other than hooking things onto somebody's telephone." He would not specify what they were.

John Diefenbaker, former Conservative Prime Minister, was among those to voice strong fears. Without "the fullest investigation to establish if members are subject to R.C.M.P. dossiers," he declared, Canada has taken "the first step toward dictatorship."

Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the Government's most outspoken champion of the right of privacy—not least his own — remained silent during the controversy, though he were. John

ing the controversy, though he has spoken out on the subject of investigation on campuses.

"Surveillance" is a sensitive word in parliamentary parlance just now. In the Commons, J. J. word in parliamentary parlance just now. In the Commons, J. J. Greene, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, was asked if the Government was considering environmental issues in the transportation of Arctic oil. "To the best of my knowledge no such consideration is under surveillance at the present time," he replied. Titters were heard and another Opposition member, half in jest, asked the Minister if, in saying "surveillance," he had meant that "he is afraid of being bugged, too."

The disquiet over the idiom of surveillance took a different turn in the courts. An Ottawa magistrate is reported to have found it hard to believe his ears when a constable testified in the lings of himpies when a constable testified in the lingo of hippies.

On-the-Job Training

On-the-Job Training

"Where did you get all those expressions," the magistrate asked. The constable said he had picked up such phrases as "pot," "dime bags," "cool guys" and "being tuned in" while working as an undercover agent in hippie meeting places.

In a case arousing widespread controversy, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police became involved a year ago—"unlawfully," according to an official investigator—in the arrest and return to the United States of three military deserters. The incident, in British Columbia, was widely publicized and debated in Canada, where deserters and draft resisters generally have received friendly treatment.

Indee F. J. C. Stewart who ment.

Judge E. J. C. Stewart, who investigated for the Justice Department after several protests in the Commons, attributed what he termed an unlawful act to a rookie constable. Because of inexperience, the judge said on the officer was unaware of something a Mountie "should certainly have realized—that no one is subject to arrest in Canada for desertion from the United States armed forces."

The judge emphasized that

The judge emphasized that no Canadian official could rightly be a party to an arrangement with the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other American authority Noatheless the impression ity. Nonetheless, the impression among many Canadians is that cooperation, if not "arrangements," with the United States authorities exist.

There is no question that when the F.B.I. asks for it, the Mounties cooperate in tracking down suspects in American criminal cases—it notably did so two years ago in the case of James Earl Ray, later convicted of the killing of Dr. Martin Lu-ther King Jr.—but the extent of the cooperation is not known because the Mounties are as tight with information about their activities as is the F.B.I.

Legislation Is Promised

To overcome some of the public lic anxieties over surveillance and bugging, the Government has promised legislation soon to has promised legislation soon to prescribe bounds for wiretap-ping and computerized data banks and dossiers. An informed source suggested that the stat-ute might require the police to get judicial or governmental ap-proval before using electronic listening devices listening devices.

Restrictive legislation would be in keeping with statements on the sanctity of privacy by both the Justice Minister, John Turner, and Prime Minister Tru-deau. Yet Mr. Trudeau, in a re-cent television interview, had this to say about changing times requiring a change of police tactics even on college campuses:

"It's apparent that if the revolution and the revolts are going to begin on campuses, if the instigators of violent dissent are going to find their natural milieu there, there can be no more exception for the intellectual part of the community in the name of academic freedom than there can be for you and me in the name of other freedoms."

The Royal Canadian Mounted the spreading use of drugs, and tachers are bestudents and teachers are beginning to complain that the mounties were not "already on campus." Student leaders there and elsewhere voiced similar views.

Alwyn Berland, executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, said: "We've never denied that the R.C.M.P. had a legitimate place on campus if following a criminal case or charged to do a security check."

The Royal Canadian Mounted of the students and teachers are beginning to complain that the mounties were not "already on campus." Student leaders there and elsewhere voiced similar views.

Alwyn Berland, executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, when the new "no-knock" law in Washington, D. C., aroused much controversy, it was noted here that Mounties carrying writs of assistance may enter anyone's force it off the campuses during ness country.

A detachment of 150 scarletuniformed men under Col.
James F. MacLeod made a forced march across the plains in 1874 to subjugate a furin the Rocky

ness country.

paper the size of legal sneets—may enter any building "or other place" by night or by day, the law says, to "break open any door, window, lock, fastener, floor, wall, ceiling, compartment, plumbing fixture, box, the commissioner of the school of the commissioner of the commissioner of the in 1874 to subjugate a fur-trading post in the Rocky Mountain foothills. Colonel MacLeod not only chased some dealers in illicit whisky back to the United States but also have to the work of the colone of the co began an honorable police tradi-began an honorable police tradi-tion for Canada.

"The force," records John Peter Turner in an official his-tory, went out "to introduce Indians and freebooters alike not have the cynical connotation in Canada that it has acquired recently in the United States. Even the most radical young Canadians are revolted nowadays at the mere thought of a Mountie's stooping to undercover work.

Protests against the Mountie's activities have grown with Eaton, dean of student affairs, in Canada that it has acquired recently in the United disclosing widespread apprehension apprehension and skepticism over the Government's stated policy of keeping policemen off college grounds except when the were specifically looking for suspects.

At Memorial University in St. John's, Newfoundland, Dr. J. D.

A profile of Commissioner Higgitt appears on Page 16.

times requiring a change of po-the spreading use of drugs, and said it would be naive to think

Last year John Deutsch, printradicipal of Queens University at Kingston, Ontario, registered a John I hiscors engaged in an unrelated investigation questioned the Peter Turner in an official history, went out "to introduce Indians and freebooters alike to civilized procedure and authority." Its success, most historians agree, may be noted in the fact that there was never a Custer's Last Stand in Canada.

As a result of the Mounties' tradition, "law and order" does not have the cynical connotation in Canada that it has acquired recently in the United States. Even the most radical young Canadians are revolted nowadays at the mere thought of a Mountie's stooping to undercover work.

Cers engaged in an unrelated investigation questioned the head of a faculty department the head of the houties at the mark the mark

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police came into being 98 years ago as a federal civil force, called then the Northwest Mounted Police, to bring law and order to a largely wilderness country.

Mounties carrying writs of assistance may enter anyone's house to enforce customs, excise, drug and narcotics-control laws without knocking or presenting a warrant.

Constables carrying the writs at random or was noted here that However, he said, the teachers' organization, which helped force it off the campuses during a controversy in the nineteen-sixties, objects to "fishing expeditions" in which plain-clothesmen questioned people at random or was noted here that However, he said, the teachers' organization, which helped force it off the campuses during a controversy in the nineteen-sixties, objects to "fishing expeditions" in which plain-clothesmen questioned people at random or was noted here that However, he said, the teachers' organization, which helped force it off the campuses during a controversy in the nineteen-sixties, objects to "fishing expeditions" in which plain-clothesmen questioned people at random or was noted here that however, he said, the teachers' organization, which helped force it off the campuses during a controversy in the nineteen-sixties, objects to "fishing expeditions" in which plain-clothesmen questioned people at random or was noted here that however, he said, the teachers' organization, which helped force it off the campuses during a controversy in the nineteen-sixties, objects to "fishing expeditions" in which plain-clothesmen questioned people at random or was noted here that however, he said, the teach-res' organization, which helped force it off the campuses during a controversy in the nineteen-sixties.

at random or used informers.
The criticism of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police seldom produces dramatic news.

The Commissioner of the R.C.M.P., William Leonard Higgitt, a name perhaps unknown to most Canadians, is in tradition of quiet-spoken, proachable but tough head men who hardly ever, by word or deed, draw attention to them-