

A boost for Colson

The long European tour being taken by retiring White House aide Charles Colson is described by insiders as a gesture by the President to enable Colson to drum up some new law clients. The President is described as particularly concerned with giving Colson a lift [?] because he regards him highly as an associate who was willing to suffer bad publicity to accomplish some necessary chores. Colson is going to Russia where companies competing for gas export licenses are retaining lawyer friends of the President to impress the Soviet government.
