Testimony on Segretti Hiring Differs

H. R. Haldeman, according to secret grand jury testimony, approved the hiring of Donald Segretti to be a political saboteur during the 1972 presidential campaign.

But former White House aides Gordon Strachan and Dwight Chapin swore under oath it was their idea to employ Segretti. "Oh yes," replied Strachan, "we talked about that, just the two of us."

"Did you go back," asked Glanzer, "and check with Mr. Haldeman to find out whether it was all right to engage in such (political sabotage)?'

"Yes we did."
"What did he say?"

"He said, yes, go ahead," testified Strachan.

The youthful Strachan also acknowledged that he had put Segretti in touch with G. Gordon Liddy, the Watergate ring-leader. As Strachan recalled the circumstances, Liddy phoned him in agitation to report strange activities in the field. Democratic and Republican candidates alike, Liddy re-

"That," said Strachan, "does not fit Don Segretti's descrip-tion. Don is a very small guy."

But small or tall, Liddy demanded to know who the Republican undercover operative was. "I want that information about that individual in the field," Strachan quoted Liddy as insisting.

Then Strachan notified Segretti. "I called Don Segretti and I told him to expect a call from Gordon Liddy, that he was concerned about his activities in the field and that he should answer his questions."

Both Strachan and Chapin insisted that Segretti operated on his own and seldom reported to them. "We thought we could pay him and forget him," explained Strachan.

"Do you mean," asked the grand jury foreman, "you would give him a lump sum and let him go on his own?

"Yes," replied Strachan, "we wanted to set him up and get him started and not have to worry about him later," They heard from him, Strachan testified, "maybe once every six weeks."

Now this is a little bit more frequently than once every six weeks." Campbell asked weeks." Campbell asked whether Strachan had "any explanation."

The former Haldeman aide answered simply "No." Later, he said sorrowfully that hiring Segretti "was a stupid decision, and I sincerely regret it. But I did it. I don't know what else to say. It was dumb, and the press, publications and so forth show it's dumb. But I did it."

Slow Mail

Congressmen investigating the nation's slowpoke postal service are furious over reports that local postmasters have been ordered not to talk about their problems to members of Congress.

Just last month, Postmaster General Elmer T. Klassen assured Congress that no "gag rule" had been imposed prohibiting postal employees from speaking out. On the contrary, Klassen said he had personally urged his employees to be candid with Congress. The news, however, has failed to reach many postmasters.

Rep. Wayne Owens (D-Utah) for example, recently sent letters to some 240 postmasters ported, were encountering Donald Campbell broke in throughout Utah. Owens, who mysterious foul-ups. He sus- "Mr. Strachan . . . let's just pledged to keep the names of

More than a month has gone by, and Owens has received only a handful of replies. As one postmaster explained to Owens: "We have been fold not to discuss this very thing with our Congressmen or Senators . . . A liaison officer has been selected by the (Post Office) department to do this."

Another postmaster replied simply: "I wouldn't dare to put in print what I think of the service, and don't even quote me saying that."

Owens' complaints have triggered an angry response from Rep. James Hanley (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Post Office subcommittee In a "Dear Ted" letter, sent to Klassen last week, Hanley said he found the complaints ne found the complaints especially annoying" because they apparently contradicted Klassen's testimony. Hanley added: "I would be pleased if you would transmit a directive to Postmasters in accord with your testimony."

Owens, meanwhile, has learned that a supervisor walked through a local Utah post office asking mail carr ers whether any had voted for Owens in the last election. Those who admitted voting for were Owens allegedly signed extra deliveries that
