

Another Refusal To 'Wallow'

Moscow

Alexander J. Butterfield, who last week told the Senate Watergate hearings that President Nixon had listening devices installed in his offices, said yesterday he doesn't want to "wallow in Watergate."

Butterfield, a former presidential aide who is now federal aviation administrator, is in Moscow for a U.S. technical display and for a joint symposium with Soviet officials on aeronautical technology.

Asked at a news conference if he has any opinion as to whether President Nixon should release the tapes of the recorded conversations, Butterfield said:

"No, I wouldn't care to express an opinion. I don't have an opinion. The President said recently that he didn't desire, as he put it, to wallow in Watergate when there is business at hand. And I feel very much the same way."
