Text of Chief Judge Sirica's pinion in

Special to The New York Times
WASHINGTON, Aug. 29—Following
s the text of the opinion accompanyng the order issued today by Chief ludge John J. Sirica of Federal District Court that the President submit tapes ind documents to the court:

On July 23, 1973, Watergate Special Prosecutor Archibald Cox, acting on behalf of the June 1973 grand jury empaneled by this court, caused to be issued a subpoena duces tecum to the President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon. The subpoena required the President, or any appropriate subordinate official, to produce for the grand jury certain tape recordings and documents enumerated in an attached schedule. The President complied with the ule. The President complied with the subpoena insofar as it related to memoranda of Gordon Strachan and W. Richard Howard, but otherwise declined to follow the subpoena's directive. In a letter to the court dated July 25, 1973, the President advised that the tape recordings sought would not be provided, and by way of explanation

. . . I follow the example of a long line of my predecessors as President of the United States who have consistently adhered to the position that the President is not subject to compulsory process from the courts.

Thereafter, the grand jury instructed Special Prosecutor Cox to apply for an order requiring production of the recordings. On July 26, the Special Prosecutor petitioned this court for a show cause order directed to the President. At the time of this application a quorum of the grand jury was polled in open court, and each juror expressed his or of the grand jury was polled in open court, and each juror expressed his or her desire that the court order compliance. Subsequently, the court ordered that the President or any appropriate subordinate official show cause "why the documents and objects described in Ithe subpoenal should not be produced as evidence before the grand jury."

In response to the show cause order, the President, by his attorneys, filed a special appearance contesting the court's jurisdiction to order the President's compliance with the grand jury subpoena. The court allowed for the filing of a response by the Special Prosecutor and reply by the President, and the matter came on for hearing on August 22.

August 22.

August 22.

The parties to the controversy have briefed and argued several issues including the court's jurisdiction in the matter of compulsory process, the existence and scope of "executive privilege" generally, applicability of "executive privilege" to the tape recordings subpoenaed, and waiver of privilege. The court has found it necessary to adjudicate but two questions for the present: (1) whether the court has jurisdiction to decide the issue of privilege, and (2) whether the court has authority to enforce the subpoena duces tecum by way of an order requiring production for inspection in camera. A third question, whether the materials are in fact privileged as against the grand jury, either in whole or in part, is left for subsequent adjudication. For the reasons outlined below, the court concludes that both of low, the court concludes that both of the questions considered must be answered in the affirmative.

A search of the Constitution and the history of its creation reveals a general disfavor of government privileges, or at least uncontrolled privileges. Early in the Convention of 1787, the delegates cautioned each other concerning the dangers of lodging immoderate power in the executive department. This attitude persisted throughout the convention tude persisted throughout the convention, and executive powers became a major topic in the subsequent ratification debates. The framers regarded the legislative department superior in power and importance to the other two and felt the necessity of investing it with some privileges and immunities, but even here an attitude of restraint, as expressed by James Madison, prevailed:

Mr. Pinckney moved a clause declaring "that each house should be the judge of the privilege of its own members."

Mr. Madison distinguished between the power of judging of privileges previously & duly established, and the effect of the motion which would give a discretion to each house as to the extent of its own privileges. He suggested that it would be better to make provision for ascertaining by law, privileges of each house, than to allow each house to decide for itself. He suggested also the necessity of considering what privileges ought to be allowed to the Executive.

The upshot of Madison's final sug-Mr. Madison distinguished between

The upshot of Madison's final suggestion regarding a definition of Executive privileges was that none were deemed necessary, or at least that the Constitution need not record any. As Charles Pinckney, the South Carolina delegate, later explained in a Senate speech:

speech:

I assert, that it was the design of the Constitution, and that not only its spirit, but letter, warrant me in the assertion, that it never was intended to give Congress, or either branch, any but specified, and those very limited, privileges indeed. They well knew how oppressively the power of undefined privileges had been exercised in Great Britain, and were determined no such authority should ever cised in Great Britain, and were determined no such authority should ever be exercised here. They knew that in free countries very few privileges were necessary to the undisturbed exercise of legislative duties, and those few only they determined that Congress should possess; they never meant that the body who ought to be the purest, and the least in want of shelter from the operation of laws equally affecting all their fellow citizens, should be able to avoid them; they therefore not only intended, but did confine their privileges within the narrow limits mentioned in the Constitution.

Let us inquire why the Constitution should have been so attentive to each branch of Congress, so isolous of their privileges, and have shewn Isic so little to the President of the United States in this respect... No privilege of this kind was intended for your executive, nor any except that which I have mentioned for your legislature. The convention which formed the Constitution well knew that this was an important point, and no subject had been more abused than privilege. They therefore determined to set the example, in merely limiting privilege to what was necessary and no more.

Pinckney's words just quoted, "they therefore determined to set the example, in merely limiting privilege to what was necessary, and no more," constitute an ant description of the was necessary, and no more," constitute an apt description of the convention's purpose and outlook. Are there, then, any rights or priviliges consistent with, though not mentioned in, the Constitution which are necessary to the executive? One answer may be found in the Supreme Court decision, United States v. Reynolds, 354 U.S. 1 (1953). The Court recognized an executive privilege, evidentiary in nature, for military secrets. Reynolds held that when a court finds the privilege is properly invoked under the appropriate circumstances, it will, in a civil case at least, suppress the evidence. Thus, it must be recognized that there can be executive privileges that will bar the production of evidence. The court is willing here to recognize and give effect to an evidentiary privilege based on the need to protect Presidential privacy.

The court, however, cannot agree with respondent that it is the executive that finally determines whether its privilege is properly invoked. The availability of evidence, including the validity and scope of privileges, is a judicial decision.

Judicial control over the dence in a case cannot be abdicated to the caprice of executive officers./1 It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expand and interest the event. sity expand and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each (2) tion of each./2

In all the numerous litigations where claims of executive privilege have been interposed, the courts have not hesitated to pass judgment. Executive fiat is not the mode of resolution. As has been stated most recently in this circuit:

No executive official or agency can be given absolute authority to deter-mine what documents in its possession may be considered by the court in its task. Otherwise the head of any executive department would have the power on his own say so to cover up all evidence of fraud and corruption when a Federal court or grand jury was investigating malfeasance in office, and this is not the law./3

Irdering the President to Submit '

The measures a court should adopt in ruling on claims of executive priviledge are discussed under Part III here-

II

If after judicial examination in camera, any portion of the tapes is ruled not subject to privilege, that portion will be forwarded to the grand jury at the appropriate time. To call for the tapes in camera is thus tantamount to fully enforcing the subpoena as to any unprivileged matter. Therefore, before the court can call for production in camera, it must have concluded that it has authority to order a President to obey the command of a grand jury subpoena as it relates to unprivileged evidence in his possession. The court has concluded that it possesses such

Analysis of hte question must begin on the well-established premises that the grand jury has a right to every man's and that for purposes of gathering evidence, process may issue to any-

The court can percieve no legal objection to issuing a subpoena duces tecum to any person whatever provided the case be such as to justify the process./4

The important factors are the rele-

The important factors are the relevance and materiality of the evidence.

The propriety of introducing any paper into a case, as testimony, must depend on the character of the paper, not on the character of the person who holds it./5

The burden here, then, is on the President to define exactly what it is about his office that court process commanding the production of evidence cannot reach there. To be accurate, court process in the form of a subpoena duces tecum has already issued to the President, and he acknowledges that pursuant to Burr, courts possess authority to direct such subpoenas to him. A distinction is drawn, however, between authority to issue a subpoena and authorithority to issue a subpoena and authority to command obedience to it. It is this second compulsory process that the President contends may not reach him. The burden yet remains with the President, however, to explain why this must be so. What distinctive quality of the Presidency permits its incumbent to withhold evidence? To argue that the need for Presidential privacy justifies it is not persuasive. On the occasions when such need justifies suppression, the courts will sustain a privilege. The fact that this is a judicial decision has already been discussed at length, but the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall on the topic deserves notice here. When deciding that a subpoena should issue to the President, the Chief Justice made it clear that if certain portions should be excised, it being appropriate to sustain a privilege, the court would make such a decision upon return of the subpoena.

There is certainly nothing before such a decision upon return of the subpoena.

There is certainly nothing before the court which shows that the letter in question contains any matter the disclosure of which would endanger the public safety. If it does contain such matter, the fact may appear before the disclosure is made. If it does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose such matter, (underscored) if it be not immediately and essentailly applicable to the point, will, of course, be supressed (end underscore) It is not easy to conceive that so much of the letter as relates to the conduct of the accused can be to the conduct of the accused can be a subject of delicacy with the President. (underscore) Everything of this kind, however, will have its due consideration on the return of the subpoena. (end underscore) And again:

The propriety of requiring the answer to this letter is more questionable. It is alleged that it most probably communicates orders showing the situation of this country with Spain, which will be important on the misdemeanor. (underscored) If it con-

Case No. 14,692d. UNITED STATES v. BURR. [Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 87.] Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 13, 1807.

CRIMINAL LAW - SUBPENA DUCES TROUM - TIME OF ISSUE-TO PRESIDENT-RIGHT TO-MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

[I. Any person charged with a crime in the courts of the United States has a right, before as well as after indictment, to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses.]

[2. A subpound may issue to the president of he United States to compel his attendance as a vitness, and an accused person is entitled to it f course.]

[3. A subpana duces tecum may issue to the president of the United States, directing him to bring any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail himself as testimony.]

[4. In Virginia, a motion for a subpoena duess tecum is to the discretion of the court; and as a legal means of obtaining testimony it cannot be regularly opposed by the opposite party in his character as such.]

[5. A motion to the discretion of a court is motion not to its inclination, but to its judg-

Chief Justice John Marshall and part of his 1807 decision that, in part, Judge John J. Sirica used in deciding.

tains matter not essential to the defense, and the disclosure by unpleasnat to the executive, it certainly ought not to be disclosed. This is a point which will appear on the return. (end underscore)

To argue that it is the constitutional separation of powers that bars compulsory court process from the White House, is also unpersuasive. Such a contention overlooks history. Although courts generally, and this court in particular, have avoided any interference with the discretionary acts of coordinate branches, they have not hesitated to rule on nondiscretionary acts when necessary. Respondent points out that these and other precedents refer to officials other than the President, and that this distinction renders the prece-To argue that it is the constitutional that this distinction renders the precedents inapplicable. Such an argument tends to set the White House apart as a fourth branch of government. It is true that Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475 (1866) left open the question Wall. 475 (1866) left open the question whether the President can be required by court process to perform a purely ministerial act, but to persist in the opinion, after 1952, that he cannot would seem to exalt the form of the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. case over its substance. Though the court's order there went to the Secretary of Commerce, it was the direct order of President Truman that was reversed.

Autonomy but Reciprocity

The special prosecutor has correctly noted that the framers' intention to lodge the powers of government in separate bodies also included a plan for interaction between departments. A "watertight" division of different functions was never their design. The legislative branch may organize the judiciary and dictate the procedures by which it transacts business. The judiciary may pass upon the constitutionality of legislative enactments and in some instances define the bounds of Congressional investigations. The executive may veto legislative enactments, and the legislature may override the veto. The executive appoints judges and justices and may bind judicial decisions by lawful executive orders. The judiciary may pass on the constitutionality of executive acts.

While the Constitution diffuses power while the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity.

That the court has not the physical power to enforce its order to the President is immaterial to a resolution of dent is immaterial to a resolution of the issues. Regardless of its physical power to enforce them, the court has a duty to issue appropriate orders. The court cannot say that the executive's persistence in withholding the tape recordings would "tarnish its reputation," but must admit that it would tarnish the court's reputation to the court of the court's reputation to the court of the cour but must admit that it would tarnish the court's reputation to fail to do what it could in pursuit of justice. In any case, the courts have always enjoyed the good faith of the executive branch, even in such dire circumstances as those presented by Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952), and there is no reason to suppose that the courts in this instance cannot again rely on the same good faith. Indeed, the President himself has publicly so stated.

It is important also to note here the role of the grand jury. Chief Justice Marshall, in considering whether a subpoena might issue to the President of the United States observed:

Bill of Rights Cited

In the provisions of the Constitution, and of the statute, which give to the accused a right to the compulsory process of the court, there is no ex-

process of the court, there is no exception whatever./8 Aaron Burr, it will be remembered, stood before the Court accused though not yet indicted. The Chief Justice's statement regarding the accused is equally true .with regard to a grand jury: "There is no exception whatever" in its right to the compulsory process of the courts. The court, while in a position to lend its process in assistance to the to lend its process in assistance to the grand jury, is thereby in a position to assist justice.

The grand jury is well known to Anglo-American criminal justice as the people's guardian of fairness. Ever since the Early of Shaftesbury relied upon its integrity, the grand jury has been promoted as a shield for the innnocent and moted as a shield for the innocent and a sword against the guilty. Among the Bill or Rights enacted by the first Congress was the Fifth Amendment, which reads in part: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." The grand jury derives its authority directly from the people, and when that group, independent in its sphere, acts according to its mandate, the court cannot justifiably withhold its assistance, nor can anyone, regardless of his station, withhold from it evidence not privileged. Marshall concluded that, conileged. Marshall concluded that, con-trary to the English practice regarding the King, the laws of evidence do not excuse anyone because of the office he holds.

... The single reservation alluded to is the case of the King. Although he may, perhaps give testimony, it is said to be incompatible with his dignity to appear under the process of the court. Of the many points of difference with exist between the first magistrate in England and the first magistrate of the United States, in respect to the personal dignity conferred on them by the Constitutions of their respective nations the court of their respective nations, the court will only select and mention two. It is a principle of the English Constitution that the King can do no wrong, that no blame can be imputed to him, expect to be shielded against the disclosure of his conduct in the event that there is evidence reflecting upon his honor.

These principles are, of course, fully applicable throughout government. A court would expect that if the privacy of its deliberations, for example, were ever used to foster criminal conduct or to develop evidence of criminal wrongdoing, any privilege might be barred and privacy breached. So it is that evidentiary privileges asserted against the grand jury may be ruled inapplicable if the interest served by the privilege is subverted. is subverted.

Nevertheless, without discrediting the strength of the grand jury's position, the court cannot, as matters now stand, rule that the present claim of privilege rule that the present claim of privilege is invalid. The President contends that the recorded conversations occurred pursuant to an exercise of his duty to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Although the court is not bound by that conclusion, it is extremely reluctant to finally stand against a declaration of the President of the United States on any but the strongest possible evidence. Need for the evidence possible evidence. Need for the evidence requires that a claim not be rejected lightly. The court is simply unable to decide the question of privilege without inspecting the tapes.

Compromise Possible

It is true that if material produced is properly the subject of privilege, even an inspection in camera may constitute a compromise of privilege. Nevertheless, it would be an extremely limited infraction and in this tion and in this case an unavoidable one. If privileged and unprivileged evidence are intermingled, privileged evidence are intermingled, privileged portions may be excised so that only unprivileged matter goes before the grand jury (which also meets in secret proceedings). If privileged and unprivileged evidence are so inextricably connected that separation becomes impossible. that separation becomes impossible, the that separation becomes impossible, the whole must be privileged and no disclosure made to the grand jury.

It should be observed as well that given the circumstances in this case, there is every reason to suppose an in camera examination will materially aid the court in its decision. The fact that extensive accounts of the recorded conextensive accounts of the recorded conversations given under oath by participants are available will enable the court to make an inteligent and informed analysis of the evidence.

The court is unable to design a more cautious approach consistent with both the demonstrated critical need for the evidence and the serious questions raise concerning the applicability of the privi-lege asserted. The court has attempted to walk the middle ground between a formula to decide the question of privilege at one extreme, and a wholesale delivery of tapes to the grand jury at the other. The one would be a breach of duty, the other ean inexcusable cours of conduct. The approach comports with precedent in this district, and honors the injunction of Reynolds and Burr to purfairness and protect essential privacy.

To paraphrase Chief Justice Marshall, To paraphrase Cmer Justice Marsnan, if it be apparent that the tapes are irrelevant to the investigation, or that for state reasons they cannot be introduced into the case, the subpoena duces tecum would be useless. But if this be not apparent, if they may be important in the investigation, if they may be safely heard by the grand jury if only in part. heard by the grand jury, if only in part, would it not be a blot on the page which records the judicial proceedings of this, country, if, in a case of such serious import as this, the court did not at least call for an inspection of the evidence in chambers?

Chief Judge, John J. Sirica (Sig.)

Chief Judge, John J. Sirica (Sig.)

Dated: August 29, 1973.

1. U.S. v. Revnolds. 345 U.S. 1, 10, 11 (1953).

2. Marbury v. Madison. 1 Cranch 137, (1803).

3. Committee for Nuclear Responsibility, Incl v. Seabors, 463 F.2D 788 (1971).

4. U.S. v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 30, 35 (Case No. 14,692D) (1807).

5. U.S. v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 34. (Case No. 14,692D) (1807).

6. U.S. v. Burr, Supra, N. 14, at 37.

7. 20 Junsstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, Supra N. 8. U.S. v. Burr, Supra, N. 14 at 34.

9. U.S. v. Burr, Supra, N. 14 at 34.

9. U.S. v. Burr, Supra, N. 14 at 34.

10. U.S. v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 11 (1953).

that he cannot be named in depate. By the Constitution of the United States, the President, as well as any other officer of the Government, may be impeached, and may be removed from office on high crimes and misdemeanors. By the Constitution of Great Britain, the Crown is hereditary and the monarch can never be a subject. By that of the United State the and the monarch can never be a subject. By that of the United States the President is elected from the mass of the people, and, on the expiration of the time for which he is elected, returns to the mass of the people again. How essentially this difference of circumstances must vary the policy of the laws of the two countries, in reference to the personal dignity of the executive chief, will be perceived by every person. by every person.

In all candor, the court fails to perceive any reason for suspending the power of courts to get evidence and rule on question of privilege in criminal matters simply because it is the President of the United States who holds the evidence. The Burr decision left for another occasion a ruling on whether compulsory process might issue to the President in situations such as this. In the words of counsel, "This is a new question," with little in the way of precedent to guide the court. But Chief Justice Marshall clearly distinguished the amenability of the king to appear and give testimony under court process and that of this nation's chief magistrate. The conclusion reached here In all candor, the court fails to permagistrate. The conclusion reached here cannot be inconsistent with the view of the great Chief Justice nor with the spirit of the Constitution.

In deciding whether these tape re-cordings or portions thereof are properly the objects of a privilege, the court must accommodate two competing policies. On the one hand, as has been noted earlier, is the need to disfavor privileges and narrow their application as far as possible. On the other hand as far as possible. On the other hand lie a need to favor the privacy of Presidential deliberations; to indulge a presumption in favor of the President. To the court, respect for the President, the the court, respect for the President, the Presidency, and the duties of the office, gives the advantage to this second policy. This respect, however, does not decide the controversy. Such a resolution on the court's part, as Chief Justice Marshall observed, "would deserve some other appellation than the term respect." Nevertheless, it does no hurt for the courts to remind themselves often that the authority vested in them to delimit the scope and application of privileges and immunities of government is a trust. And as with every trust, an abuse can reap the most dire consequences. This court, then, enters upon its present task with care and with determination to exercise that judicial restraint that characterizes the conduct of courts.

The teaching of Reynolds is that a court should attempt to satisfy itself whether or not a privilege is properly invoked without unnecessarily probing into the material claimed to be privileged. A decision on how far to go will be dictated in part by need for the evidence. dence.

dence.

In each case, the showing of necessity which is made will determine how far the court should probe in satisfying itself that the occasion for invoking the privilege is appropriate. Where there is a strong showing of necessity, the claim of privilege should not be lightly accepted, but even the most compelling necessity cannot overcome the claim of privilege if the curt is ultimately satisfied that milicurt is ultimately satisfied that military secrets are at stake. A fortiori, where necessity is dubious, a formal claim of privilege, made under the circumstances of this case, will have to prevail.

The grand jury's showing of need here is well documented and imposing. The special prosecutor has specifically identified by date, time and place each of the eight meetings and the one telephone call involved. Due to the unusual circumcall involved. Due to the unusual circumstances of having access to sworn public testimony of participants to these conversations, the special prosecutor has been able to provide the court with the conflicting accounts of what transpired. He thus identifies the topics discussed in each instance, the areas of critical conflict in the testimony, and the resolution it is anticipated the tape recordings may flict in the testimony, and the resolution it is anticipated the tape recordings may render possible. The relative importance of the issues in doubt is revealed. One example, quoted from the special prosecutor will suffice:

Meeting of September 15, 1972. On September 15, 1972, the grand jury returned an indictment charging seven individuals with conspiracy and other offenses relating to the break-in. Respondent met the same day with Dean and Haldeman in his Oval Office from 5:37 to 6:17 P.M. Both Dean and Haldeman have given lengthy but contradictory accounts of what was said (S.Tr. 2229-33, 6090-93). (S.Tr. 2229-33, 6090-93).

According to Dean, the purpose of the meeting was to brief respondent on the status of the investigation and related matters. Dean said that respondent then congratulated him on the "good job" he had done and was pleased that the case had "stopped with Liddy." Dean said that he then told respondent that all he had been able to do was "contain" the case and "assist in keeping it out of the White House." (S.Tr. 2230.) If this testimony is corroborated, it will tend to establish that a conspiracy to obstruct justice reached the highest level of government. government.

government.

Haldeman, after reviewing a tape recording of the meeting, has agreed that there was discussion of the Watergate indictment, of the civil cases arising out of the break-in, of the possibility of a continuing grand jury investigation, of internal politics at the Committee for the Re-election of the President, and of other matters. He denies, however, that respondent congratulated Dean on Dean's efforts to thwart the investigation. (S.Tr. 6090-93, 6456.).

If Haldeman's innocuous version of the meeting can be sustained, it is the meeting can be sustained, it is because the meeting only involved an because the meeting only involved an innocent discussion of political interests. The question of Dean's perjury would then arise. Resolution of this conflict between two of the three persons present and an accurate knowledge of plans or admissions made on this occasion would be of obvious aid to the grand jury's investigation.

Validity Questioned

Validity Questioned

The point is raised that, as in Reynolds, the sworn statements of witnesses should suffice and remove the need for access to documents deemed privileged. Though this might often be the case, here, unfortunately, the witnesses differ, sometimes completely, on the precise matters likely to be of greatest moment to the grand jury. Ironically, need for the taped evidence derives in part from the fact that witnesses have testified regarding the subject matter, creating important issues of fact for the grand jury to resolve. It will be noted as well in contradistinction to Reynolds, that this is a criminal investigation. Rather this is a criminal investigation. Rather than money damages at stake, we deal here in matters of reputation and liberty. Based on this indisputably forceful showing of necessity by the grand jury, the claim of privilege cannot be accepted lightly.

In his brief of support, the special prosecutor outlines the grand jury's view regarding the validity of the respondent's claim of privilege. Its opinion is that the right of confidentiality is improperly asserted here. Principally, this is a criminal investigation. Rather the special prosecutor cites a substantial possibility, based on the sworn testimony of participants, that the privilege is ilege is improperly invoked as a cloak for serious criminal wrongdoings.

According to the testimony of John W. Dean, many of the conversations in which he participated were part and parcel of a criminal conspiracy to obstruct justice by preventing the truth from coming out about the additional participants in the original conspiracy to break into and wiretap the offices of the Democratic National Committee. He has testified that in the presence of H. R. Haldeman he the presence of H. R. Haldeman he told respondent on September 15, 1972, that "all [Dean] had been able to do was to contain the case and assist in keeping it out of the White House." Dean also told respondent that he "could make no assurances that the

"could make no assurances that the day would not come when this matter would start to unravel."

Respondent allegedly congratulated him on the "good job" he was doing on that task. (S.Tr. 2229-30). Dean also has testified that on March 13, 1073 respondent told him that re-1973, respondent told him that re-1973, respondent told him that respondent had approved executive clemency for Hunt, and that there would be no problem in raising $1-million to buy the Watergate defendants' silence (S.Tr. 2324). In addition, there is uncontradicted testiment, that respondent was briefed on mony that respondent was briefed on Watergate on June 20, 1972, three days after the arrests, by Haldeman, Ehrlichman and Mitchell, his closest political advisers (S.Tr. 5924, 3407-08). If these three told respondent all they allegedly know proposed. they allegedly knew, respondent would have been aware of details of the nascent cover-up.

When Claim Fails

It is true, of course, that other testimony indicates that the conversa-tions did not include direct evidence tions did not include direct evidence of criminal misconduct. While this is not the time or place to judge credibility, Dean's testimony cannot be dismissed out of hand. In fact, Haldeman has confirmed many of the details of the meetings at which both he and Dean were present. The opposite conclusions he draws are based upon a different interpretation and different recollection of some of the details. details.

details.

If the interest served by a privilege is abused or subverted, the claim of privilege fails. Such a case is well described in Clark v. United States, 289 U.S. 1 (1933), a decision involving the privilege of secrecy enjoyed by jurors.

The privilege takes as its postulate a genuine relation, honestly created and honestly maintained. If that condition is not satisfied, if the relation is merely a sham and a pretense, the jury may not invoke a relation dishonestly assumed as a cover and cloak for the concealment of the truth cloak for the concealment of the truth.

With the aid of this analogy (to the Attorney-client privilege) we recur to the social policies competing for supremacy. A privilege surviving until the relation is abused and vanishing when abuse is shown to the satisfaction of the judge has been found to be a workable technique for the protection of the confidences of client and attorney. Is there sufficient reason to believe that it will be found to be inadequate for the protection of a juror? No doubt the need is weighty that conduct in the jury room shall be untrammeled by the fear of embarrassing publicity. The need is no less weighty that it shall be pure and undefiled. A juror of integrity and reasonable firmness will not fear to speak his mind if the confidences of debate are barred to the ears of mere imhis mind if the confidences of debate are barred to the ears of mere im-pertinence or malice. He will not