United and the Chapin Question

Dwight L. Chapin, President Nixon's former appointments secretary and now a figure in the Watergate investigation, needn't worry about keeping his job as a marketing official with United Air Lines, at least for the time being. Mr. Chapin has been accused by one Senate Select Watergate Committee witness, Donald H. Segretti, of hiring him to set up a network to spy on Democratic candidates. But Edward E. Carlson, president of United, said yesterday that the constitutional rights that protect all Americans apply to Mr. Chapin. "If criminal charges are placed against him and he is found guilty," said Mr. Carlson, "we would then look at Chapin in the same way as another employe."
