

The incredible corruption that courses through the veins of our society—in industry, commerce and politics, in public administration of village, town, city, county, state and nation—must somehow be extirpated. The guilty must be dealt with in a manner appropriate to those who commit crimes against the public trust. There is indeed the possibility that we may have reached the point of no return.

The percentage of those who remain apathetic, if not really supportive of the miscreants of Watergate, is truly frightening. If the Augean stable is not cleaned out and the guilty punished, then the people of our dear land will become reconciled to crime, whether in low places or high, as our way of life. Moreover, they will conclude that if money remains the yardstick for measuring success, those who rear their children on the premise that honesty is the best policy will be making failures of their offspring.

IRVING CAESAR.

New York.