Nixon Tax Data Decision Pending

Washington

President Nixon intends to make public "complete information" on his finances but has not decided whether to make available copies of his income tax returns, deputy press secretary Gerald Warren said yesterday.

Senators who met with the President Monday evening quoted him as saying that he planned to release complete income tax returns this week.

Warren said that a staff group is working on the report but that Mr. Nixon has not determined "what form or forum" he will use in releasing the information.

The President is determined to clear up what Warren called "erroneous charges and allegations" about his personal finances.

"We have people at work compiling information which the President will provide," Warren said. "The President wants this information out. He's going to get it out. I won't tell you now how it's going to be done."

White House aides are working on a number of "white papers which they hope will clear the President of charges made against him concerning his finances and Watergate-related matters.

At a morning meeting, the President conferred with the Domestic Council committee on drug abuse and the cabinet committee on international narcotics control.

After the meeting, the President reported substantial progress, declaring that "we are now on the way to winning the battle against this grave problem."
