

Political Donors Who Gave Big

Here's a List Of the Big Contributors

Washington

A ten-volume study by the citizen's group Common Cause showed yesterday that 35 big spenders gave almost $1.4 million to congressional candidates in 1972.

The 35 included all those who made gifts totaling $20,000 or more. The biggest share, more than $668,000 went to incumbents. Of the remainder, about half went to challengers, but more went to races with no incumbents.

The biggest individual contributor, Common Cause officials said in a news conference, was Cordelia Scaife May, heir to the Mellon family fortune which includes Gulf Oil, banking interests and the Aluminum Co. of America.

The $110,000 May contributions went almost entirely to Republicans. She also gave more than three times as much to incumbents as challengers.

Common Cause said donors whose names are linked either currently or through inheritance with Gulf Oil Corp. or Sun Oil Co. gave a combined $251,000 to congressional candidates in sums of more than $20,000.

The report said the 1116 candidates in 1972 general election congressional races raised $62.3 million in contributions after the new reporting law went into effect on April 7 of that year. They had $7 million cash on hand whose source is unknown.

Jack Conway, president of Common Cause, said the organization compiled the data because the government officials charged with doing so did not.

"Our ten-volume study sets forth the history of a failure of American politics," project director Fred Wertheimer said. "Any illusion about the existence of a competitive two-party system for federal elections is shattered by the hard realities of American political financing.

"The existing campaign finance system sends funds predominantly to incumbents, reducing real political competition in America to a bare minimum, and establishing a controlling incumbency party."
