Diplomatic Bombing

THE UNITED STATES bombed North Vietnam over Christmas, 1972, in order to persuade South Vietnam to accept the truce agreement. By "brutalizing" Hanoi, as General Alexander Haig put it to Nguyen Van Thieu in Saigon, we aimed to convince President Thieu that he would be milnarily secure after the truce.

That conclusion emerges irresistibly from a remarkable study of American negotiating tactics in the years leading up to the signing of the Vietnam agreement in January 1973. The account is by Tad Szulc, a former New York Times correspondent; it appears in the new issue of the magazine Foreign Policy.

The article reflects access to previously unpublished documents, giving the first-hand flavor of such things as the Haig-Thieu talk. But its significance, which is considerable, lies not in juicy details but in the picture it gives of the whole sweep of an extended diplomatic event. Szulc is spare in drawing his own inferences: he lets the reader draw them from his powerful array of facts.

The concession that eventually made agreement possible, according to this account, was made secretly by the United States in April 1972—in Moscow. Henry Kissinger told Leonid Brezhnev that the United States would accept a cease-fire without demanding withdrawal of North Vietnamese troops that had been in the South before April 1.

THE QUESTION that leaps to mind is why the United States waited so long, through so many years and deaths, to make that concession. Szulc says that as early as 1970 a National Security Council study advised Kissinger that Hanoi would never agree to remove its troops from the South. The answer indicated here is that the prospect of the 1972 election is what concentrated Kissinger's mind — and perhaps persuaded his master to give him a freer hand.

Kissinger is inevitably the main focus of this article. His negotiating techniques are laid bare. To a notable extent, they amount to deception: telling each side what it wants to hear. In Vietnam, the technique failed in the end — after a last virtuoso display of two-faced tactics.

In May 1972, during the Nixon-Brezhnev summit, Kissinger confided further American concessions to the Russians. In June he went to Peking and, with Chou En-lai, took a conciliatory philosophical line toward Hanoi.

Then in July he visited Thieu in Saigon—and sounded very different. The Nixon Administration had to talk peace because of the upcoming election, he said; it would make seemingly attractive proposals, knowing that Hanoi would reject them. After the election it would be a "different story": America would not hesitate to bring Hanoi to its knees. He recommended that Thieu plan an invasion of North Vietnam after the election.

THIEU WAS NOT told about the American negotiating concession. Kissinger was obviously confident that he could bring him along when terms were agreed with Hanoi. But when the secret talks with Le Duc Tho produced a draft agreement in October, Thieu was angry and recalcitrant. He blocked all the carefully made plans, even though Nixon had cabled Hanoi on October 21 that "the text of the agreement could be considered complete."

In a major move to appease Thieu, the United States immediately began rushing $1 billion in new military equipment to him. On November 20, in a fresh round of talks with Le Duc Tho, Kissinger read "for the record" a South Vietnamese document demanding 69 changes in the text.

At that point, according to Szulc, the North Vietnamese began looking as if they had cold feet about the whole thing. That was hardly surprising, after the United States had set out to transform the battlefield situation and inject new issues into the talks.

Only then did Hanoi propose textual changes of its own. Kissinger denounced them as perfidious. The Christmas bombing began. By the time it ended, Thieu was much more agreeable.

M ANY OUTSIDE observers of the truce negotiations have felt all along that the Christmas bombing was designed mainly to bring Saigon along. We know that the bombing had no measurable effect on the terms reached with Hanoi, because the text signed in January was virtually identical with the October draft.

Reading the Szulc study, one perceives an evem more cynical possibility: Kissinger may have tabled Saigon's demands on November 20 — demands that he knew were unacceptable — precisely in order to provoke new proposals from Hanoi that could serve as an excuse for bombing.

In any event, the record is clear that the United States backed off an agreement, then bombed the other party to mollify a recalcitrant ally.
