The Nixon Statement

More Questions Left Than Answered; Little Indication Given on Next Move

WASHINGTON, Aug. 5 -President Nixon said a great deal to the nation in his twopage statement this afternoon.

He said that he was indeed

page statement this afternoon. He said that he was indeed aware immediately after the Watergate break-in of the "advan-tages" of conceal-Analysis ing the Nixon con-nections of the Watergate burglars and that he had given "errone-ous" information to the House Judiciary Committee. But for all the potential im-pact of these concessions, the significance of the President's statement may lie, even more, in what he did not say. For days the capital has buzzed with talk of a new Nixon strategy, with debate over whether he might tempo-rarily step aside or even resign, as Senator Robert P. Griffin, the Republican whip, suggested this morning. But the admittedly damaging tape transcripts released by Mr. Nixon late today have plunged him into even deeper trouble not only with his crit-ics, but more importantly, with the men who went to great lengths to support him. Two Quick Questions So there ware two questions

Two Quick Questions

Two Quick Questions So there were two questions, really, after Mr. Nixon delivered his surprise — first, what the day's move meant and what prompted it, and second, what moves would follow. The first question seemed the easier, for all that Mr. Nixon appeared to be doing today, in terms of strategy, was to deal with a specific problem. The problem was that his submis-sion of "erroneous" information was probably about to be dis-covered. covered.

Given the circumstances, Mr. xon appeared to have had Nixon appeared to have had little real alternative to the ac-tion he took.

tion he took. The President's statement it-self tells the story. It notes that there are tapes in existence of his conversations with H. R. Haldeman, his former chief of staff, on June 23, and that those tapes record his own comments about the political advantages of concealing the backgrounds of the Watergate burglars. burglars.

burglars, It notes that Mr. Nixon chose not to tell either the committee or his own staff, including James D. St. Clair, his chief defense lawyer, of these tapes, and the obvious fact that they tended to contradic som of his prior statements.

his prior statements. And then, in its most telling portions, the statement notes that these are among the tapes that Mr. Nixon is handing over to Federal Judge John J. Sirica as directed by the recent Supreme Court ruling uphold-ing the special Watergate pros-ecution subpoenas. The statement does not make

The statement does not make the point directly, but the im-plication is obvious: unless Mr. Nixon decided against turning the tapes over to the judge— and thus defied the Supreme Court the information or the Court—the information on the tapes would become public sooner or later. If the information leaked out, the effect on Mr. Nixon's trial could be disastrous.

The Role of St. Clair

The chronology also suggests another factor: Mr. St. Clair. Last week, Judge Sirica di-rected Mr. St. Clair to oversee the turnover to the court of the subpoenaed tapes; Mr. St. Clair thus became responsible for knowing what was on them. them.

them. It is likely that if Mr. Nixon had not disclosed the informa-tion, Mr. St. Clair, once he ob-tained it, would have felt com-pelled to do so. He was the one, after all, who presented to the House the Nixon informa-tion that the President de-scribed today as "incomplete and in some respects errone-ous." Mr. Nixon may of course.

Mr. Nixon may of Mr. Nixon may of course, have hoped to accomplish some-thing else as well—to take the headlines away from today's calls for resignation, for in-stance, and perhaps to take advantage of the common tendency of people to sympa-thize with a man who owns up to his mistakes course, tendency of people to the thize with a man who owns up to his mistakes. Yet he could not erase the question raised by the calls for resignation — first by Senator Senator Griffin, and later this afternoon, by Representative Charles E. Wiggins, the Califor-nia Republican who had been his chief defender on the House Judiciary Committee. Mr. St. Clair was reported this afternoon as saying that Mr. Nixon would not resign, but rightly or wrongly, such statements have been given little credence in Washington since Vice President Agnew resigned only days after insisting that he would stay in office.

Resignation would have some obvious advantages for Mr. Nixon. It would allow him to retain his pension and the vari-ous other financial benefits that would be denied him if he were convicted by the Senate. It would allow him a far more graceful way out of office than the ignominy of conviction in the Senate.

the ignominy of conviction in the Senate. On the other hand it would cost him the chance he has now, however slender it may retaining office. And it would be, of beating conviction and also be risky; a straight resig-nation, without any kind of arrangement such as that worked out by Mr. Agnew, might lead to his prosecution on criminal charges. The grand jury that indicted the defendants in the Water-gate cover-up named Mr. Nixon as an unindicted co-conspira-tor; it did so, apparently, be-cause it had wanted to indict him but was told by the prose-cutors that it was not clear whether it was legally possible to indict an incumbent Presi-dent. If Mr. Nixon were out of dent. If Mr. Nixon were out of office, the legal problem would no longer exist.

There are a variety of ways, cenceivably at least, by which Mr. Nixon could make an agreement under which he would resign from office and save the nation the agony of a Senate trial in return for immunity from further prosecution. He could make an agreement with the special procession

He could make an agreement with the special prosecution. He could reach an understand-ing with Vice President Ford, in which Mr. Ford, upon as-suming the Presidency at Mr. Nixon's resignation, could par-don him. Or, Congress could pass a law granting immunity— though because of the late date, this seems somewhat improbable.

Big Step for Jaworski

It is likely that any such arrangement would come only

It is likely that any such arrangement would come only if there were a certain con-sensus in Congress. For Leon Jaworski, the special prosecu-tor, would probably not feel it proper to take such a momen-tous step on his own; nor would Mr. Ford. Another option available to Mr. Nixon is to step aside temporarily and let Mr. Ford assume the powers of the Pres-idency for the duration of the impeachment proceedings. The 25th Amendment provides the procedure for such a transfer. Here there are possible ad-vantages as well as disadvan-tages. It is obvious that Mr. Nixon is not able to devote his full time to his job, so if he did step aside, he might get public credit for being more interested in the nation's welfare than in his own enjoyment of the office. Also, he would be able to con-centrate totally on his defense. But Mr. Nixon would not be able to command the public at-tention—and television time— to the same extent that he can now. Nor would he be able to carry out any possibly popular governmental acts—foreign pol-icy moves, say. And as a prac-tical matter, his foreign policy may be one of his drawing cards in fighting conviction. The Final Option Then there is the option of

The Final Option

The Final Option The Final Option Then there is the option of staying in office and fighting to the end. In some ways, this may be the most attractive of all to Mr. Nixon. Fighting, obviously, is Mr. Nixon's only chance of finish-ing his term. And if he does win, the prosecutors might well exercise their vast discretion and decide against bringing charges against him when he finally does finish his term and become a private citizen. Losing would be devastat-ing, of course, both personally and financially. Yet the reports of Mr. Nixon's impending fi-nancial doom—his loss of pen-sion and other benefits upon conviction—are rather disin-genuous Mr. Nixon has several very wealthy friends who have provided him with funds in the past; also he will probably be able to make money of his own writing. The prosecutors would prob-past, also no make money of his own able to make money of his own writing. The prosecutors would prob-ably think that conviction in the Senate and loss of office was a brutal enough penalty for any man; they would prob-ably not press criminal charges. And Mr. Nixon could con-tend that his conviction was politically motivated. The evi-dence against him is strong and the rolls show that the majority of Americans want Mr. Nixon impeached and con-victed. But they also show a sizable number who still sup-port him.
