Election Panel Nears Approval of Corporate Political Action Groups

By WARREN WEAVER Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14.—The Federal Election Commission prepared today to give its approval to the establishment of corporate political action committees that make contributions to candidates favorable to business.

During a two-hour discussion of an advisory opinion requested by the Sun Oil Company, the commission made clear that it favored authorizing such committees, with the only question involving the groups from which they may solicit voluntary contributions.

A proposed ruling drafted by agents produced an unusual standing-room-only crowd at today's meeting.

Under existing practice, a campaign committee seeking campaign contributio nation's stockholders, using corporate funds to finance the political campaign treasury collected.

But Thomas B. Curtis, chair-two other members argued that a corporate committee should be able to solicit funds from employees of the corporation as well as shareholders, as long as no coercion was involved.

Test Case Seen

Regarding the Sun Oil request for a ruling as a test case, many corporations have been watching for the commission's reaction, and their make earmarked contributions to a corporate-run fund, which

Under existing practice, a corporation sets up a committee, financing all its expenses, and the committee urges employees—often concentrating on better-paid corporate officers—to contribute to its political fund.

Corporate officials then decide, in the course of the campaign, which candidates should receive contributions from the fund. Those who contribute have no voice in this choice; they assume that the money will go to candidates who favor the corporation's political position.

There is a second kind of plan under which employees make earmarked contributions to a corporate-run fund, which simply passes them on to the designated party or candidate.

Today's debate indicated that it might be illegal to finance such a system with corporate funds.

Joining Mr. Curtis in favoring that would permit corporate solicitation of employees by corporate political committees to solicit funds from the general public.

Thus, at least half of the six-member bipartisan agency supports that position.

Miss Aikens also argued in favor of using corporate funds tailed regulations, subject to

for the operating expenses of Congressional approval.

Mr. Curtis opposed any plan to permit corporate committees to solicit funds from the general public.

The commission is expected to adopt a revised version of the opinion approving the Sun

Oil plan, with some modifications, later this month. Ultimately, it will draft more de-dtailed regulations, subject to

for the operating expenses of Congressional approval.
