

Notes on People by Laurie Johnston

NYTimes • OCT 30 1975
 Bernard Barker, one of the convicted Watergate burglars, started work Tuesday as a $796-a-month sanitation inspector for the city of Miami—a post he got through a Federal job-training program. He said he did the same work for two years in his native Cuba, but in Miami he was a real estate agent “until the market went bad.” Mr. Barker, who is still on parole, said he had been living on the advance from a forthcoming book and the $140-a-week earnings of his wife, Clara. Although his main duties will be to educate the public in the disposal of garbage, he will have power to take violators to court.
 After failing to take preventive

Notes on People, Laurie Johnston