

Notes on People

*Kleindienst Attends
Unveiling of Portrait*

In a tradition that began in 1794 with Edmund Randolph, a portrait of Richard G. Kleindienst, a former Attorney General, was unveiled in a corridor of the Department of Justice yesterday. Mr. Kleindienst resigned in 1973, after less than a year, citing the involvement of many close associates in the Watergate situation. A year later he pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor for refusing to testify fully in the I.T.T. anti-trust suit. His one-month sentence and $100 fine were suspended.

Speaking at the ceremony for the $5,000 portrait were Attorney General Edward H. Levi, Deputy Attorney General Harold R. Tyler Jr. and Solicitor General Robert H. Bork, as well as Mr. Kleindienst. A reception followed in the Attorney General's office.

Hospitalized since Dec. 31 Mamie Eisenhower is having difficulty in fighting off a viral infection, a spokesman for Army Medical Center said yesterday that the 67-year-old Mrs. Eisenhower is recovering.

William Schurtman, a lawyer for the corporation, while questioning a witness about records the former Beatle had made for other companies, held up one from a stack of albums before him. It was the famous cover showing the Lennons nude and he held it in clear view of the six-member jury. James H. Bergen, Mr. Lennon's lawyer, asked for a mistrial. Although Mr. Schurtman insisted that his choice of the album was not deliberate, Judge Lloyd F. MacMahon, ordering a new trial, snapped angrily, "It was plainly prejudicial to its face."

As honorary National Biographer, President Ford has a fact book on the life of the president.