Soviet Actr
Visa for U

"I'm too happy for words, but I knew I would eventually get permission," Zoya Fyodorova, the Russian actress, said yesterday on learning she had been given a visa to travel to the United States in time for the birth of her grandchild. She stayed in Russia when her daughter Victoria, a movie actress, came to this country in March 1975 to meet her father for the first time. He is a retired Navy admiral, Jackson R. Tate, of Orange Park, Fla., and his love affair with Zoya Fyodorova in World War II, when he was stationed in Moscow, later caused her imprisonment for eight years. Three months after her arrival here, Victoria Fyodorova married an airline pilot, Fred Pouy, and they live in Stamford, Conn. Their child is due about May 11. The grandmother-to-be said yesterday that she hoped to leave for the United States sometime next week.

It just isn't so, said Charles W. Colson, the former White House counsel turned evangelist, that Richard M. Nixon, his one-time boss, was a heavy drinker in his last days as President.

Mr. Colson, in Nashville to promote his own book about his spiritual "rebirth," called "Born Again," commented on "The Final Days," the new book about Watergate's aftermath by Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward, the Washington Post reporters who got much credit for exposing the Watergate scandal. In the book, the reporters said Mr. Nixon had taken to heavy solitary tipping shortly before his resignation. Stating that this was false, Mr. Colson commented that Mr. Nixon "always said the mark of a good politician is the ability to stop at two drinks."
