Unions and Navy Settle
Row Over Accused Sailors

A dispute between two maritime unions and the Navy Department over the alleged "beaching" of merchant seamen believed to have "subversive" inclinations has been settled, it was learned today, by an agreement guaranteeing a hearing for men accused.

The settlement, Navy officials said, was reached at conferences between Assistant Secretary of the Navy Bard and representatives of the National Maritime Union and the American Communications Association. Both are CIO affiliates, the latter made up of radio operators.

Mr. Bard, it was said, agreed to the reinstatement of Murray Winocur, ACA vice president, who had been removed from his job.

In addition, the Navy agreed to give immediate consideration to union suggestions for new safety-at-sea rules, for the training of merchant seamen as gunners and for the utilization of small boats in anti-submarine patrol.
