F.B.I. Yields Rosenberg Files in Bid by Sons to Prove Parents Were Innocent

By PETER KHSS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3—A quarter century after Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were arrested as atomic spies, the Federal Bureau of Investigation today released 29,000 pages of investigative reports and other files that the Rosenbergs' sons hope may reveal that their parents were innocent.

Neither son, Michael or Robert Meeropol, nor their representatives appeared there. But inspection of some of the papers, clipped together in 70 clumps showed, among other things, the following:

A poignant appeal from the star witness, David Greenglass, brother of Mrs. Rosenberg, against the death sentences for her and his brother-in-law was quoted on March 24 and 27, 1950, made three months before their electrocution June 19, 1953. Mr. Russians was so like the American atomic bomb" that the American might make them confess and "if these two die, I shall live the rest of my life with a very dark shadow on my conscience."

Mr. Greenglass admitted about the same time, March 23, 1953, that he had stolen from a Federal court suit by the Meeropol brother under the Freedom of Information Act. The bureau said that the files were available first to the petitioners and some researchers who had already filed requests, but that other persons could telephone or write to the F.B.I. freedom of information section to ask for an appointment to interview. His wife, Ruth, said he had kept it in "an old sock" as a souvenir. Mr. read the files

Greenglass said he threw it into the East River after his first denial of the theft.

Dr. Rudolph Peterls, head of the British mission to Los Alamos, expressed doubt that Klaus Fuchs, ever transmitted information on atomic research to the Soviet Union and said that in his opinion Dr. Fuchs surrendered himself and created the story of his espionage activities, in 1950 to induce declassification of the paper's secrets.

The British leader's suggestion was derided as "a lot of baloney" by his American Army machinist at Los Alamos in 1945. He testified that he had given information on the Rosenberg's deaths and to a 30-year sentence for Morton Sobell. Mr. Greenglass was an Army machinist at Los Alamos in 1945. He testified that he asserted that between 1932 and 1935, "both Julius Rosenberg and Ethel Rosenberg became involved with the bureau. One memorandum said that the mother had suggested that Mrs. Rosenberg "divorce Julius," and that Mrs. Rosenberg had

Mr. Greenglass was sentenced to 15 years on the charges of conspiracy to commit espionage, charges that led to the Rosenberg's deaths and to return" to visit her.

A memorandum on a Sept. 12, 1950, F.B.I. interview with John Rogge, sent to President Eisenhower urging that the death sentences be commuted.

In a letter his attorney, O. John Rogge, sent to President Eisenhower urging that the death sentences be commuted, Mr. Greenglass wrote that his own testimony had been an "act of contrition for the wrong I had done my country, my family and myself."

"Here I had to take the choice of hurting someone dear to me," he wrote, "and I took it deliberately. I could not believe that this would be the outcome. May God in His mercy change that awful sentence."

The documents showed evidence of violent Communists, and since that time have maintained that nothing is more important than the Communist cause." Samuel Greenglass was quoted as saying he "became so concerned over the Communist influence of Julius Rosenberg that he offered to pay their transportation to Russia if they would agree to stay there" but that "they declined." After the death sentences, the mother and another brother, Bernard, visited Mrs. Rosenberg in Sing Sing Prison March 14, 1953. A memorandum said she "yelled and the advent of a 'sovietized' dum said that they were "trying America to free him."

F.B.I. View of Rosenberg

"Rosenberg," the memorandum said, "believes that he is brilliant both as an engineer and as an espionage agent and feels that he is a martyr to the cause," resolving that he will not reveal his associates in espionage and relying on influence of Julius Rosenberg and Ethel Rosenberg became involved with the bureau. One memorandum said that the mother had suggested that Mrs. Rosenberg "divorce Julius," and that Mrs. Rosenberg had to get her to confess and involve innocent people."

A May 18, 1951, post-trial memorandum from the F.B.I.

office in New York responded
