Ex-Envoy's CIA Charge Against Kissinger

Washington

Former Chile Ambassador Orlando Letelier has charged that Henry A. Kissinger took the initiative to assure Letelier personally in late 1971 of non-intervention by the CIA in Chile, although the public record now clearly indicates involvement by the agency.

Letelier, ambassador here for the government of President Salvador Allende, was imprisoned for a year by the military junta that seized power in September, 1973. He is now a lecturer at American University here.

Kissinger's initiative in December, 1971, followed allegations of a CIA role in the first major anti-Allende demonstration in Santiago, the women's "March of the Empty Pots."

"Kissinger asked me to assure President Allende that there was not a single person involved either directly or indirectly," Letelier said.

The meeting, before Kissinger became Secretary of State, took place following a dinner at the home of columnist Joseph Alsop.

Letelier said he was told Kissinger would come with a special message for him. "He drew me aside to say that there were no CIA people involved in any internal Chilean problem," said the former ambassador.

When the 1971 women's protest against food shortages took place, pro-Allende newspapers in Chile and elsewhere noted the similarity of the demonstration to those by women in Brazil, allegedly with CIA backing, before the 1964 coup ousting a left-wing government in that country.

Letelier said he believed Kissinger's assurances, passed them to Allende and used them as a basis for counseling restraint in later instances when his government suspected U.S. involvement in Chilean affairs.

However, according to Representative Michael J. Harrington (Dem-Mass.). CIA Director William E. Colby testified before a House subcommittee last April that the Forty Committee of the National Security Council authorized $5 million for anti-Allende efforts following election of the Marxist in late 1970.

The government has not specified what form that activity took, beyond a press conference statement by President Ford last September indicating that the money went to support opposition parties and newspapers.
