

Notes on People byline, Albin Krebs

●
A man once considered a possible successor to J. Edgar Hoover as director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, William C. Sullivan, had some sharp opinions about the agency. Mr. Sullivan, who rose to assistant director before his early retirement last year, has been named assistant director of the Insurance Crime Prevention Institute. While at the F.B.I., he said, he was unable to abide by the agency's "fossilized bureaucratic traditions and obsolete policies," adding: "I saw that gray was the predominant color in the pursuit of right and wrong and that decision-making required greater understanding."

●
Within hours after she filed her petition, Mrs. Phyllis