THE QUESTION

Should there be a new investigation into the assassination of Pres. Kennedy?

WHERE ASKED

Madison.

THE ANSWERS

Elinor Sheldon, 2301 Cyprus Way, Secretary—I'm really of two minds on this question. On the one hand, if responsible, a authoritative people with sufficient professional training feel that there are enough questions left unanswered by the Warren report, there should be a quiet investigation. On the other hand, now that the initial impact of the horrible event has passed, one has a tendency to say 'let sleeping dogs lie.'

Leonard Hausman, 1402 Regent St., Research Fellow —

Yes, I think so. In my opinion, there have been enough doubts raised since the Warren report to warrant another investigation. Such an investigation would be a relatively low cost item and would serve, if nothing else, to quiet the suspicions still in the public's mind. I know that I am not satisfied with the findings of the Warren Commission because of so many questions which were left unanswered.

Alex Grobman, 140 W. Gorham St., Student—I'm not sure what a new investigation would prove. But if enough responsible people feel that more study is required, it should be done. I don't think that the time allowed for the Warren report study was sufficient to get all the answers to all the questions. The language of the commission report itself would lend one to believe that there are some areas still in doubt.

Guy Stephenson, 4301 Bonner Lane, Research Products

— I don't think anything would be served by holding a new investigation. I think the findings of the Warren Commission were correct and conclusive.

The length of the report alone is enough to indicate that they explored all possible avenues. Many of these questions which have been raised have been done so for the purpose of selling articles. I don't think there has been sufficient new evidence to warrant a new investigation.

John Spangler, 3622 Becker Dr., Co-ordinator of Voluntary Services — My feelings are that the issue should be dropped. I think that all the physical evidence has been gone over many times and seems to be pretty conclusive in line with the findings of the Warren Committee. I think nothing would be gained by a new investigation. There is some danger that such a renewed probe would stir up many negative feelings.
